

From the graphs below, we could see that the impact of internet coverage on happiness score is nearly linear with narrow confidence bands. This linearity is consistent across continents. Also, it seems that the impact of Internet coverage is the same across all continents as the slopes are comparable. Thus I doubt that the happiness score is more likely to be dominated by some development variable, e.g. Internet coverage, instead of representing a mixture of various aspects of the society.

